

were faced with everyday challenges she had never experienced before, and there was a real need for change. As a teacher, however, Carole felt she was limited in how she could effect the meaningful change that was desperately needed in her community.

Despite her pedigree and desire to make a difference, Carole's ascension into public office happened almost by accident. When the current legislator in her district suddenly became ill and died, those in the community who were impressed by her interest in changing the status quo encouraged her run. She filed for office on the day of the filing deadline, and in 1976, she was elected to represent the 51st District of Missouri. Thankfully, for the people of Missouri, there was nothing accidental about her approach to legislating. Hailing from the home of Harry Truman, Carole had a real no-nonsense style about her, and she could get things done.

During her 18 years as a member of the Missouri House of Representatives, Carole sponsored 93 bills, many of which became law, including the largest insurance reform bill in Missouri history. But what Carole was most known for was her vigorous pursuit to improve the way the State of Missouri delivered health and mental health care. In 1981, she became the first woman in Missouri history to chair a standing appropriations committee, and for 13 years Carole reigned over the Committee on Appropriations for Health and Mental Health. At the time she was appointed to this position, Missouri was headed into a recession, and there was a desperate need to cut health services. Yet Carole was able to make the necessary changes without sacrificing services. In fact, throughout her tenure as chair of the committee, Missouri reduced overall costs of mental health care programs while improving the services it provided.

Carole's dedication to those suffering from mental illness, developmental disabilities, head injuries, and substance abuse was truly unparalleled. While her work with community mental health centers or substance abuse programs seldom made the front page, she worked tirelessly in the pursuit of better treatment for these special citizens. The result of her dedication was the transformation of a badly broken mental health system into a community-based approach that provided real options for some of our most vulnerable.

In 1995, Carole retired from the Missouri House of Representatives, but her commitment to her community and the democratic process has continued. She has remained dedicated to improving services for the mentally ill, substance abusers, and victims of domestic violence. She has worked with Thank You Walt Disney Inc. to help restore Walt Disney's downtown Kansas City Studio. She has worked tirelessly to elect democratic candidates who embody the same steadfast dedication to effect change that she had during her time in public service, including devoting countless hours on the phones and going door-to-door for then Presidential candidate Barack Obama. Once again, her hard work paid off.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate to join me in wishing Carole Roper Park Vaughan a very happy 70th birthday. She has been a remarkable servant to the citizens of the State of Missouri and I am grateful to call her my friend.●

COMMENDING EDGECOMB POTTERS

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. President, Midcoast Maine is a special place for Mainers and tourists alike. With its beautiful harbors and quintessential Maine villages, the region is a remarkable cross-section of our State. Nestled on route 27 in the heart of this striking area is Edgecomb Potters, a veritable gem in Maine's art world. I rise today to recognize this superb Maine company and the innovative spirit of its founders.

Located in the town of Edgecomb, Edgecomb Potters was started in a small one-room schoolhouse by owners Richard and Chris Hilton in 1976. Before starting the business, Richard had been planning on entering the broadcasting industry, while Chris was an art teacher. Since that time, Edgecomb Potters has crafted over 1.3 million unique pieces of gorgeous pottery, and it averages 200,000 pieces each year. Additionally, the company has expanded to its present day 28-acre complex, where it has eight kilns, and added satellite retail locations in Freeport and Portland. Edgecomb Potters has also grown to a team of more than 30 employees in that time, and over 150,000 people visit the company's three locations each season. Beyond its own pottery, Edgecomb's stores showcase the work of over 400 different artisans, many of them Mainers, specializing in jewelry, sculpture, and glass.

The Hiltons work together on each design. Richard Hilton serves as Edgecomb's master potter, studying the organic composition and history of ceramic glazes from all over the world, and Chris lends her extensive art background to the output of beautiful pieces of pottery. They are consistently producing new and creative glazes and patterns which lend a unique rarity to the company's many pieces. All glazes and porcelains are made on site with glazes named by the colors they evoke, such as Lady Slipper Pink, Apple Green, and Honey Green. In addition to these inventive colors, the potters frequently add golden flecks, shimmering crystals, and flowing artistic tones to give a distinctive finish to each piece.

During the company's 33-year history, Edgecomb Potters has rightfully gained significant national recognition. The Hiltons' passion for glaze development has led them to be considered national leaders in this field, and has propelled their company to be recognized by the Boston Globe, Ceramics

Monthly, American Style and numerous other publications. Edgecomb Potters also garnered international attention when trade representatives from Taiwan purchased one of their large vases for that country's president in 2001. The vase was made using Kyoto Forest, a unique glaze Mr. Hilton concocted based on a 17th century Chinese glaze. The company has also been named one of America's "Best of the Road" companies by Rand McNally. The global atlas producer lists Edgecomb Potters as "one of the most highly acclaimed art potteries in America," and cites the "one-of-a-kind" pottery as an incentive for people to visit this extraordinary facility.

Edgecomb Potters continues to expand because of the Hiltons' constant and abiding passion for art and pottery, and the number of new customers they continuously attract worldwide is impressive. Indeed, Edgecomb's presence in Maine's art scene has placed our State on the national map as a destination for lovers of stunning and matchless pottery. I congratulate Richard and Chris Hilton, and everyone at Edgecomb Potters, for their pioneering spirit, and offer my best wishes for their continued success.●
